Mr. JAMES NAULTY,
Apartment 303,
3319 Chauncey Place.

Through the above sources it was verified that Mr. and Mrs. FARRIS LLEWELLYN WOFFORD, JR. continue to reside in Apartment 102, 3319 Chauncey Place.

None of the neighbors contacted have had any close personal contacts with the WOFFORDs, their information being confined to seeing them in and out of the building, and observing whether or not other persons enter and leave the WOFFORD apartment. All of the persons contacted advised that they have not observed any apparent meetings of a questionable nature taking place at the WOFFORD apartment, similar to the meeting reported to the FBI on the evening of March 23, 1951.

They did note that Mr. WOFFORD was apparently away several weeks during the summer and Mrs. WOFFORD was away for a few days. In this period there were two young men who had every appearance of being college men, who stayed in the apartment in the absence of the WOFFORDs. Neighbors gained the impression that these young men were undoubtedly relatives of Mr. or Mrs. WOFFORD.

The persons contacted had no other information of interest to offer.

Chink in the Curtain

From July 28 to Aug. 11, the Sixth World Festival of Youth and Students will meet in Moscow. Like the preceding Youth Festivals held every two years since 1947, it is sponsored by international Communist-front organizations and is undoubtedly designed to advance the propaganda interests of the Soviet Union. We think it is all the more likely to succeed in this design because the American Department of State has strongly discouraged, although it has not forbidden, attendance by an American delegation.

Some 30,000 young persons from outside the U. S. S. R. are expected to attend, according to Soviet predictions. They will come in part from Soviet satellite countries; but a considerable number will be drawn from uncommitted or Western-oriented Western European and Asian countries. Many, perhaps, will be hand-picked by Communist organizations. Unhappily, in view of the State Department attitude, this will probably be very largely the case with the small group going from the United States.

It would have been a great deal better, we think, if the State Department had given encouragement and assistance to a delegation of typical American students to attend the festival. We have no fear that students educated in American schools, bred in the American tradition, committed to democratic principles, would have been subverted by contact with foreign Communists; it is much more likely that they might have won some converts to American ideas. At any rate, they could have presented a much more attractive picture of American life than the few Americans who will participate; and at the very least they would have refuted the Communist propaganda that Americans are confined behind an iron curtain.

A recent issue of The New Republic contains an interesting pair of articles debating the issue. Harris Wofford Jr., who believes that it would have been wise to take advantage of this chink in Russia's iron curtain quotes in support of his position a statement made by President Eisenhower last September: "If we are going to take advantage of the assumption that all people want peace, then the problem is for people to get together and to leap governments—if necessary to evade governments—to work out not one method but thousands of methods by which people can gradually learn a little bit more of each other." This seems to us an impressive argument. We wish the State Department had heard it.

NOTE:

Worford being considered for position on President's Commission but in interim designated as with GSA which is handling processing of these individuals. He is an associate of Chester Bowles and reportedly junior partner/Dean Acheson's law firm. He has been described as anticommunist and avidly interested in world government. He has been prominent in affairs of United World Federalists (not cited). Recently toured Russia with Chester Bowles. Attended Youth Festival in Prague, 1947. Described by others at time as one of anticommunist minority in U.S. delegation. Interviewed by Bureau on return and cooperated. Has been reportedly affiliated with some questionable groups but described as anticommunist.

This position is "excepted" as opposed to competitive in Federal service. CSC now has our reports, State reports on wife and current CSC reports conducted during past two months. Original correspondence from GSA requested that results of National agency checks be furnished as soon as available. CSC has not complied. In light of "excepted" nature of position it is up to GSA to review material available and decide if full field is necessary. We have told CSC no action in absence of a specific request.

Kennedy Advisers on Civil Rights Urge More Active Presidential Aid

Wofford

Reporters of The Washington Post have intensively interviewed many of the men who, while not a part of his campaign staff, are contributing ideas on national policy to Sen. John F. Kennedy. These men, most of whom are university professors, were asked what they think government should do in America today. This is the fourth of a series of articles based on the interviews.

By James E. Clayton
Staff Reporter

The problem of desegregation in American schools, Prof. Paul A. Freund of Harvard says, "is so much bigger than the dimensions of a law suit."

That, in a sentence, sums up the advice which the academic lawyers in the background of Sen. John F. Kennedy's presidential campaign have been supplying to their candidate.

They have been telling him that the only solution to school desegregation and to civil rights problems in general, and the need for famed Title III which was knocked out of the 1957 and 1959 civil rights acts by Congress. But their talk all comes down to more participation by the President as the key to these problems as well as to those of discrimination in employment and housing.

Foremost among the men who have been giving civil rights advice to Kennedy are Freund, a 52-year-old widely respected authority on constitutional law, and Harris Wofford, Jr., a 34-year-old Notre Dame professor who has joined the Kennedy forces on a near full-time basis.

Wofford is one of the members of Kennedy's civil rights campaign section which is headed by Marjorie McKennie Lawson. Mrs. Lawson and Frank Reeves, both Washington attorneys, apparently will have leading roles in plotting campaign strategy. But for legal advice in this highly legalized field, the Kennedy operation is likely to depend upon Wofford who in turn may refer constitutional questions to Freund, Mark De-Wolfe Howe, and Abram J. Chayes. Howe and Chayes are also Harvard law professors.

Wofford's career has been an impressive mixture of teaching and politics, civil rights and international affairs. A former president of Student Federalists, he was producing books on international affairs before he was 21. He traveled with Chester Bowles overseas two years ago, served as legal assistant to the Rev. Theodore M. Hesburgh, president of Notre Dame and a member of the Civil Rights Commission, and is a good friend of the Rev. Martin Luther King, Southern Negro leader.

Critical of Administration

Wofford is highly critical of what he sees as the Eisenhower Administration's lack of drive for enforcement of the 1957 civil rights acts. "There should have been 40 law suits filed instead of four," he says. The suits are aimed at opening up Negro voting in the South. There can be no extensive progress in this field, he believes, without a "combined assault" by the President, the Department of Justice, and Negro movements.

Wofford says there is a clear need for a White House office on civil rights to bring the President more closely into the struggle. He calls for a "more imaginative and inventive" role for the Department of Justice in bringing voting cases into court. He thinks there may be authority for the Attorney General to act in more civil rights cases without the provisions of Title III. But he would like to see that proposal, which would authorize the Attorney General to seek court orders in desegregation cases where he now may not have that authority, written into law.

On school desegregation, Wofford favors the 3-year deadline of the Democratic platform. The platform urges such a deadline for the filing of desegregation plans in every district. The South has to get started sometime, Wofford says, and nothing has happened yet in 1700 school districts.

Contrary to some liberal leaders, Wofford likes the Nashville plan which calls for the desegregation of one grade a year in a stair-step arrangement beginning at the first grade. He also has kind words for the voluntary transfer part of the plan which permits students in a racial minority at a particular school to transfer out of it.

Wofford learned much about passive resistance when he visited India and has spoken widely in the South on the sit-in movement. He supports the sit-ins as a means of communicating the feelings of the Negro about the way he has been treated.

Part of the President's job, Wofford says, is to facilitate communication between the races. He thinks President Eisenhower has failed to do this.

A Moderating Force

Freund is apparently a moderating force in the civil rights field. He holds one of a half dozen top-ranking chairs at Harvard where he is noted for an objective, above-the-crowd approach to problems. He came to Washington in 1932 as a law clerk to Justice Louis D. Brandeis and worked in the Treasury Department, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and the Solicitor General's office before returning to Harvard to teach in 1939. He was back here during the war with the Justice Department and the Solicitor General. He turned down a preferred appointment as Solicitor General in 1952.

Sitting in a book-lined office at Harvard where autographed pictures of Justices Brandeis, Benjamin Cardozo and Felix Frankfurter hang on the walls, Freund conveys the impression of considerable detachment from the political wars.

This position is representative of many of the academic men who are advising Kennedy. They answer questions and provide research but their views are only one set of ideas which are fed into the Kennedy campaign organization. How much weight they carry depends largely upon who they are and how much Kennedy political advisers and staff members agree with them.

... for desegregation deadline

Freund was one of those who helped Kennedy in his fight for repeal of the disclaimer affidavit that was attached to student loan funds. This required students who wanted Federal money, not only to swear allegiance to the United States but also to swear that they had no connection with any subversive or near-subversive group.

Freund says the need for this affidavit must be balanced with the "chilling effect" it has on academic programs. He calls it an excuse on the part of some Congressmen for not doing anything better in their fight against communism. Why apply it to students and not to others? he asks. "Anyone who is disloyal runs enough risks anyway not to worry about perjury" when he signs such a statement, Freund explains. He thinks the general academic revulsion against the affidavit, even to the extent of refusing the money, was encouraging.

Favors School Deadline

On school desegregation, Freund says it is "highly important to get the car on the track." For that reason, he favors a deadline requiring school districts to submit a plan for desegregating. With a deadline, he says, people will have to start thinking about the problem instead of "resisting the inevitable." To a time limit for a plan of not disregard local conditions, he adds, because the plan can be tailored to fit local conditions. "The way to desegregate is to begin," he says.

Freund urged Kennedy and Congress last year to pass the registrar plan for registering Negro voters rather than the referee plan which was adopted. The registrar plan would have put the first step in the program in the Executive branch of government and not, as does the referee plan, in the courts.

He thinks the Federal courts have been asked to "shoulder a tremendous load" in voting, desegregation and other civil rights fields. He is concerned with the damage which may be inflicted upon the courts by constant attacks and thinks the Executive branch should carry part of the load.

"It seems a pity that people are faced with undergoing all the harassment of a law suit" just to register to vote, he says.

Chayes, a general handymen in the Kennedy camp, echoes much of Freund's words. An outspoken, politically oriented professor of 38, who was a key staff member of the committee which wrote the Democratic platform, Chayes has only sharp words for the Eisenhower Administration and civil rights. He thinks the Supreme Court was let down after its school desegregation decision in 1954. If the Court had anticipated that no other agency of government would help in the desegregation fight, Chayes speculates, it might have ordered desegregation at a faster pace than that ordained in its "all deliberate speed" formula.

All the Kennedy advisers agree with the story that what the President should have done at Little Rock when Negro students were turned away by state troops was to go there, put his arm around the shoulder of a Negro girl, and walk to the school with her. That is the kind of Presidential action they are talking about.

All of them also back Sen. Lyndon Johnson's bill for a conciliation service. Such a group would get Southern leaders together to talk about civil rights problems and to share each other's experience in solving them.

This, Chayes thinks, "would get moderates in the South off the hook." He contends that there are moderates there who would come forward and work for solutions if only there were a place to come to.

One job of the President, he says, is to provide such a place.

While talking in itself does not solve problems, Chayes admits, he argues that it is hard to hold a position across a conference table just because of stubbornness. There are lots of arguments about desegregation in general, he contents, but it is much harder to argue against desegregating the first grade.

Disciple of Holmes

The other Harvard professor in the civil rights group is Mark De Wolfe Howe. Howe has been an outspoken civil rights advocate down through the years ever since he finished a year working for Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes in 1934. An author of several books on Holmes, Howe joins with Freund in their discipleship of the great jurist.

Howe was one of those who urged Kennedy to fight the disclaimer affidavit, a device which he calls "most unwise and perhaps unconstitutional." He has argued for a more active role for the Attorney General in civil liberties cases, contending that, although there is a question of how far the Federal Government can go without Title II, the Attorney General should have found exactly how far he could go.

Howe argues that as long as the NAACP is functioning, the Attorney General can take a lesser role. But when states drive private organizations out of an active role in civil rights cases, the role of the Attorney General to protect individual rights becomes "peculiarly important."

On the school desegregation issue, Howe describes himself as a gradualist who opposes "too many arbitrary deadlines." He thinks there is much merit in plans like that of Senator Johnson for a conciliation service.
